WASHINGTON - The White House is taking steps to protect private information of U.S. citizens amid widespread concerns about National Security Agency leaker Edward Snowden and potential efforts to disseminate the material online, the Associated Press reported on Friday. If the matter is being taken more seriously, it is unclear what it means for Snowden, who is currently in Hong Kong and was granted asylum there this week. "I don't think it's wise to make definitive statements on that without any evidence to support that," said White House press secretary Jay Carney in remarks to reporters. Snowden, a former government contractor for the NSA, disclosed secret surveillance programs that appear to target U.S. phone and internet users and has also disclosed material on widespread Internet data collection by U.S. authorities. The material, if released, would expose the identities of Americans, their communications, and their associations with one another, experts say. "Whoever is releasing this material, if they succeed in making the document available to the general public, I think they are going to expose a lot of people," said Mark Klein, a former AT&T technician who exposed similar government surveillance programs in the early 2000s.
